

HSBC // Michael // Transcript

My name is Michael and I am now a project manager in the Global Liquidity and Cash Management department at HSBC.

I studied economics and finance at university. I found out that one of the seniors was working at HSBC and so that's why I got a chance to catch up with her to know more about the programme before I applied for it.

The global banking business covers a wide range of services and products. It includes FX trading, investment services and even payment and receivables. I think Global Liquidity & Cash Management is one of the essential parts of global banking because it allows companies to make payments and receive payments from all over the world.

I think the Global Liquidity and Cash Management programme is a really rewarding experience. Through the different rotations in the programme I managed to get involved in client initiatives and projects to help solve client problems.

I think the graduate programme really does expand your horizons because you get multiple opportunities to work with both internal and external stakeholders. So through these multiple interactions within the two year programme we get to build our personal network and we also build our expertise in different product areas.

HSBC is a really inclusive company to work in because in my department there are different people from all walks of life and we do have the flexibility in terms of the working arrangement as well.

If you have an inquisitive mindset and also are detailed orientated and would like to make use of your analytic skills to analyse what makes a business run successfully on a daily basis, then you should come and join Global Liquidity & Cash Management and explore how you can add value to the whole payment processes.
